Tip Pixel manipulation can be done with most of the features in Photoshop, but some features require more advanced knowledge in terms of how the image data is created. For this reason, most tutorials assume you are familiar with basic Photoshop skills before approaching a particular application's tools. ## Take Care of Layers Although every file that you create in Photoshop is stored as a single layer, it is customary to work with layers. Layers are used for many reasons. For example, layers help you arrange data logically and protect it by masking and protecting areas on the layer. Layers can also help you present an image in several ways. In Chapter 9, you saw how you could create a background image and then apply the photo layer on top of it to achieve some interesting effects. The layer underneath the photo layer remains as a guideline for printing.

Q: Is there a way to show a blank slide in PowerPoint? I am writing my first Java application for PowerPoint. I want to be able to create a blank slide and display it during PowerPoint presentation. I do not want the slides in presentation to be populated. Is there a way to do that? I came across this post: Change the image of a PowerPoint slide programmatically I tried the options suggested in the answers, but they do not work on my PowerPoint 2010 versions. I use PPT 2010 in Windows 7. I have also tried `ShowSlide(SlideShow.SHOW_CONTINUOUS)`; before inserting slides in the presentation, but it also results in empty slide.

A: You can use the `SlideShow.ShowSlide` method. The parameter for this method allows you to insert a slide with the value 'continuous' meaning that you can insert a new slide at the same time as you change the slide show. In your code you can therefore do something like this: `SlideShow slideShow = PowerPoint.getPowerPoint();`

`slideShow.ShowSlide(SlideShow.SHOW_CONTINUOUS);` Slide newSlide = slideShow.InsertSlide(1, "New slide 1");

Comprehensive nuclear chemical analysis of treated and untreated reclaimed water to mitigate risks from radioactive contamination in potable reuse schemes in order to mitigate associated public health risks. Whilst reusing treated water to address drinking water scarcity challenges, particularly in South Africa, are of increasing interest in all countries, some countries have gone further by developing local treated water recycling schemes. Reclaimed water from these schemes may become contaminated with radioactive elements. This could therefore increase radiological risks to consumers. In view of this, South Africa established its Water Reclamation Regulations under the Environmental Management Systems Act, the terms of which define what constitutes treated recycled water for reuse purposes and that it may be further treated to mitigate radiological risks. This study presents the results of a comprehensive nuclear chemical analysis that was performed on a sample of the reclaimed water treated by the KZN Water Reclamation Projects and untreated reclaimed water to assess possible radioactive contamination that may result from the release of treated wastewater into the environment. The individual and combined radiological and chemical risk levels associated with these reclaimed water types were determined. The results clearly indicate that the radiation dose resulting from the reclamation of wastewater is

The left is riding a huge wave of tech support for its efforts to convince people to mistrust the FBI and CIA. From the president down, it's getting a lot of help from tech and security experts. If you think maybe some of these experts have an ulterior motive, well, it's only because you're a Russian bot. "I think there's a substantial amount of bots," said cybersecurity expert Dan Guido on Wednesday's "The Daily" on Fox News. "I would not be surprised if more than half of the comments I'm seeing on Twitter are bots." Guido didn't just take aim at Twitter users, saying he'd seen many of the same bots on Facebook, as well. Also Read: Despite Guido's claim, it's no easy task to determine if the Twitterati are bots or otherwise. The company's own rules, of course, stipulate that "we do not consider users who engage with our service to be 'bots.'" Guido offered several reasons why some Twitter users could appear fake, from bot-like behavior to the fact that they all share the same 20 or so tweets with very similar messages. Of course, the same could be said of the accounts that post anti-Trump messages. Many of the same people could be bots and the same tweet could be copied and pasted as often as the Twitter user wants. But Guido thinks the rules still matter. "The application of rules, if you like, is actually more important than the number of people using it," he said. "If you can't apply rules, they're not worth anything." You can debate whether that's true, but overall, Guido and I both agree that a lot of your tweets could be pretty sketchy. And that makes both of us robots.
