Mitotic spindles are microtubule (MT)-based structures that pull chromosome to opposite poles of the cell, ensuring accurate cell division. However, spindle assembly and function is strongly dependent on the microtubule network. To understand this complex relationship and how it is regulated during development, it is important to determine the dynamics of spindle microtubules relative to the nuclear membrane. Here, we show that spindle MTs form in close proximity to the nuclear envelope in a manner that depends on the balance between growth and shrinkage of individual MTs relative to nuclear membrane. MTs that strongly shrink when close to the nuclear envelope (especially those in interphase) disappear from the spindle and the other side of the nucleus. In addition, some MTs that grow weakly when close to the nuclear envelope become very long and diffuse in the cytoplasm. Furthermore, we find that MTs of relatively weak shrinkage activity exist for a shorter time in the spindle than those of strong shrinkage. Our results show that local interactions between MTs and the nuclear envelope are a major determinant of dynamics and hence of spindle function.Q: Can one vote to close a question before it has been answered? We all have the ability to make a difference in someone else's life." -Arielle Ford I have recently been thinking about what true heroes would be. I think a hero is someone who goes out of their way to help someone else. Even if it is just a slight kindness like saying "Good morning" to a stranger. Although we have all been given the opportunity to make a difference in someone else's life, we can't always, don't always realize it, don't always see it, don't always do it. If you're that way inclined, go out of your way to do something nice for someone that will help them, either in that moment or later on. For example, open the car door for the person behind you or wave a thank you to someone who has helped you at a store. If you are out with friends, take the person who is feeling blue and tell them how much you care for them. If you catch someone 'cheating' on someone, tell them. We cannot count on our own actions. Others have to count on us. I think that is the true hero. f678ea9f9e
